Real Estate Syndication

Syndication refers to the division of property ownership into smaller parts. This allows multiple individuals to invest in the same property with a fractional ownership. In a real estate syndication, a General Partnership and Limited Partnership are often used.

Limited Partners (LP) in this arrangement have no involvement in the property's day-to-day operations, but they have the right to vote on major decisions. The General Partner (GP), on the other hand, takes an active role in managing the investment.

Securities Act and Offering Memorandum

In most cases the offering of an investment in a real estate syndication requires compliance with the Securities Act. Real estate syndications are typically offered under one of the many exemptions provided for in the Act, using an Offering Memorandum.

The Offering Memorandum is essentially the rules of the game. It includes key information about the way the partnership will operate and how it will be structured. The Offering Memorandum contains the financial terms, sales charges, expenses, conflicts of interest, a business description of the partnership, investment objectives, risk considerations, and tax considerations.
